The CFIA says the so-called "van guard" operators are considered "process workers" under the Food and Drugs Act and therefore should be regulated. The industry has been operating outside of Canadian food safety regulations. But lawyers for the growers argue that the people are simply selling their produce and are not employers. "The labour provisions of the Food and Drugs Act are not applicable to the people who are doing this," said Josh Paterson, a lawyer for the growing companies. Farmers argue that small, local farmers can't afford to pay OSHA rates for workers. (CBC) "The very purpose of the regulations is to control the
